Bring garden freshness indoors

Nothing can liven up a menu like the taste of herbs tainers beneath the pots.

Don't rush to bring the newly transplanted herbs inside. Instead, allow the plants to adjust to their new environment by moving them out of direct sunlight for about a week. This will accustom the plants to the lower light conditions they will experience indoors. Then bring the pots inside a few hours at a time for another five to seven days, after which it is safe to move them inside permanently. Watch for hitchhiking insects. Hit the plants with a strong stream of water to knock pests off or use an insecticidal soap before introducing the potted herbs to your houseplants. Unless you have a very bright window, these perennial herbs may not flourish for more than a few weeks to a month, but at least you will be extending their season of use.

Annual herbs, such as basil and cilantro, are best planted from seed. Chives, though perennial, might be best treated as annuals, if fresh shoots are desired all recent lamp or grow light can be used.

Most herbs prefer temperatures between 60 and 70 degrees. Be careful to keep the soil moist, but not too wet. Over watering can Service serve all people regardless of race, color, age, sex, religion, disability or national origin.
